to administer the vaccine as directed. The fact that Lucinda wouldn't have known what a supine position was unless she had been taught was somewhat missed, but then again, she seemed to be one of the normal kind of student and not one of the dangerous weirdos that they commonly tried to scare the neighborhood into sending their kids to. That last bit was a relief, because I really didn't want to take the risk of writing a story about a kid who was too darned smart for her own good. Luckily, he didn't have any kind of semaphore, or if he did, he'd have kept it between himself and Enceladus. It was hard not to mentally figure out what the heck that kid was on about, either. Whoever had abducted his family had been planning at least a few years - or even decades - to do it. Wouldn't they have taken a few of the shipments of the virus and tested it, at least? Wouldn't they have known how to counteract it? It was supposed to be a simple virus; they'd have had no reason to believe it had a nasty side effect. And yet, apparently, somebody did. Who knew about it? How had it gotten in? Why were they trying to smuggle it? Were they planning something with it? Who? Everybody else was talking about it, but nobody knew anything. Nobody had any answers. "Skeptic," Cleon mused, watching her finger draw circles in the soft dust on the floor. "What the hell would a skeptic do with a virus? Are we sure this stuff is just a virus?" "I'm sure it's a virus," she said. "What would I have said? Who is the postulator of the universe, the creator of the world? Would I have said that the virus was an accident?" "Well, if it's a virus, we'll need to consider the possibility that somebody else did it," he said. "Maybe on purpose, with a plan in mind." "And if that's the case, who is planning it?" "Well, it could be a conspiracy. Somebody who wants to pull us all into the 21

[Chronic disease self-management in a health area: barriers to care and best practices]. Self-management of chronic diseases is a useful alternative to conventional medicine, and sometimes is the only treatment indicated for some diseases. The present study analyzes the extent to which self-management is practiced in health care centers, as well as the obstacles that interfere with patients using this alternative treatment. An exploratory, descriptive, and comparative study was designed in 2011. A total of twenty-six health care centers and two family medicine clinics were surveyed. A total of 532 patients were selected using convenience sampling. A structured interview was conducted to determine the degree of self-management used in each health care center and the obstacles found in self-management of chronic diseases. The level of self-management did not change significantly between centers with one doctor and between centers with more than one doctor. Age, gender, and time since the diagnosis were all related to the level of self-management. The main obstacle was the lack of coordination between healthcare centers. The involvement of health professionals in self-management is recommended in order to improve self-management of patients with chronic diseases. A right-handed batsman and slow left-arm bowler, he represented the Royal Navy, the Royal Air Force and the Royal West Kent Regiment in first-class cricket from 1901 to 1931. Born in Royal Hospital Kilmainham in Dublin, Noonan had first-class cricketing experience with the Royal Navy, playing a total of eleven first-class matches from 1900 to 1902 before leaving the service. He then joined the Royal Air Force, making his debut for the service in the 1919 Minor Counties Championship, playing as a right-handed batsman and left-arm bowler for West Kent. He took 11 wickets in his debut match, and
